The attendants, thinking he was aiming at a bird, did not interfere, and he had time to lower the bow and lodge the arrow deep in the flesh of Akbers shoulder. The assassin was immediately cut to pieces, and the arrow was with some difficulty extracted. The wound, though deep, did not prove serious, and healed over in about ten days. Shortly after Akber set out from Agra on a hunting excursion. This was his unbok ostensible object, but his real design was to nip in the bud an insurrection which ot was meditated by Abdollah Khan Usbek, the governor of Malwah. He accordingly turned suddenly aside, and, in spite of the rainy season, made an incursion into that province. He had only reached Oojein when Abdollah Khan, taking guilt to himself, marched off with his forces and treasure for Gujerat. Akber chivalrously pursued with a small body of horse, but met with so much opposition that he was obliged to fall back on Mando. The annoyance caused by this Usbek was said to have given Akber a rooted dislike to the whole race; and it was generally rumoured that he meant to seize and imprison all the Usbek chiefs. The consequence was a general Usbek revolt. In a short time the insurgents mustered 40,000 horse, with which they ravaged the territories of Berar and Juanpoor. One of the leaders of the revolt was Asuf Khan Heroy, governor of Kurra. Shortly after his appointment he obtained permission to subdue a country called Gurrah, which was at the time governed by Doorgawutty, a ranee or Hindoo queen, as celebrated for beauty as for ability. The aggression appears to have been unprincipled, for the only reason assigned for it is that Asuf Khan had heard of the riches of Gurrah. After several p...
