

Samuel Lyle, Criminologist

Excerpt from Samuel Lyle, Criminologist
Arthurs father telephoned to the police in Hopedale, and the chief made his plans promptly; he told Mr. Smith to stay where he was and keep the boys with him, telephoned Inspector Gibb of the Murder Squad in Alden, and ordered one of his men to take to the woods every available man. The chief knew that the murder of John Harden would shock the whole country, for John Harden was a great financier, and the chief wanted to be sure that no act of his should be Open to criticism later on. Inspector Gibb, too, with four of his men, was there within an hour and found the woods sur rounded by men who allowed no one to pass who had no business there. There was good reason for this, for footprints might be a most important clue. Inspector Gibbs men found footprints be fore they had been there ten minutes, and they were measured and photographed and their peculiarities noted in the most elaborate detail.
