Not illustrated. 1883 Excerpt: ...Trust Act which it proposes to amend has been law about seven years, and honorable members will recollect that when it passed through this Chamber a great variety of opinions were expressed with regard to it. I know that I and some other honorable members then opposed it more or less warmly, but it was ultimately carried by a large majority, and I am ready now to admit--I think we will all admit--that the Melbourne Harbour Trust have, since they were constituted, done good and important work for the port of Melbourne. Under these circumstances, it is not, I imagine, too much to say that they have earned a title to come down to the House and ask for the increased powers they require in order to carry on their business in the best possible way. Those increased powers they have been seeking for a considerable time. In 1880, only some three or four years after they came into existence, they found it necessary, owing to the great demand made upon them for wharfage accommodation, and also to the way in which the works they had to undertake continually grew in magnitude and importance, to appeal to Parliament to pass an amending Bill which would validate their past acts and give them larger scope in the future. For instance, they wanted borrowing powers, and also parliamentary authority to go on with the construction of, first, their intended canal across Fishermans Bend, and secondly, a series of docks. Matters standing thus, they prepared a Bill for themselves, quite independently of the Government of the day, but not, I believe, until a deputation from them had waited upon Ministers and requested them to undertake the task. That Bill was introduced here by the honorable
