Not illustrated. 1896 Excerpt: ... against him and quickened their zeal: and thus it came to pass that in the autumn of 541, long before the messengers had returned from Constantinople, Eraric had been slain by the conspirators and the young Baduila had been raised on the shield as King. The unanimous testimony of the coins of the new Double King proves that Baduila was that form of his name his name, by which he himself chose to be known From some andTotlla. cause, however, which has not been explained, he was also known even to the Goths² as Totila, and this name is the only one which seems to have reached the ears of the Greek historians. It is useless now to attempt to appeal from their decision, and the 1 Friedlnender (Die Mtinzen der Ostgothen, 46-51), after enumerating several types of silver and copper coinage bearing the name of D(ominus) N(oster) Baduila Rex, says emphatically, The name of Totila occurs on not a single coin. a I think the fact that Jordanes uses and prefers this form justifies us in making this assertion. He begins by saying De Regn. Successione, 379), Malo Italiae Baduila juvenis nepus (sic) asciscitur Heldebadi. A few lines later we find, Totila qui Baduila hostile opus in Italia peragit: and after this he is always Totila in Jordanes. It may be noticed that Jordanes once makes the accusative Totilam, and twice Totilanem. Book v. name Totila is that by which he will be mentioned!--1 henceforward in this history. 54! The new King wielded the Ostrogothic sceptre character. for eleven years, a longer period than any of his predecessors since the great Theodoric. Coming to the help of his countrymen when their cause seemed sunk below hope, he succeeded in raising it to a height of glory such as even under Theodoric himself it had scarcely surpassed. Thou...
