

Native Daughter: The Story of Anita Whitney (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Native Daughter: The Story of Anita Whitney The little girl, she could not have been more than seven, was wide-eyed at the vibrant brilliance which filled the vast rotunda of the Capitol Building. The gas jet flames, the source of all this illumination, sparkled through the varicolored crystals of great chandeliers which descended from the tall ceiling that soared upward and upward in a majestic curve to form the Capirol dome. The crowd that moved through this spacious chamber was as brilliant as the light. How beautiful were the ladies, their rich satins reflecting the glow of the lights! How imposing the gentlemen, stiff in their formal frock coats, elegant in their white gloves! The little girl was awed not only by the physical splendor of the scene, but by the vague knowledge that these handsome ladies and gentlemen were Americas great, its statesmen and soldiers, lawmakers and jurists. She clutched more tightly at the hand of her aunt who swept through the crowd with aristocratic ease. At times she glanced at her uncle, Justice Field, bowing stiffly in recognition of respectful greetings on all sides.
