Not illustrated. 1914 edition. Excerpt: ...the Missouri Argus remarks, We... need hardly add that we fully coincide with the Editor of the Bulletin (issue of December 9, 1836). The same year that the anti-abolition feeling drove Lovejoy from St. Louis an episode growing out of the slavery situation convulsed Marion County. Dr. David Nelson, president of Marion College, who was a Southerner and a former slaveholder, read at a religious meeting a paper presented to him by Colonel John Muldrow proposing to subscribe $10,000 himself and asked others to subscribe, to indemnify masters for their slaves when government should think proper to abolish slavery in that way. This led to a personal encounter between Muldrow and a certain extreme pro-slavery citizen named John Bosley, in which Bosley was severely injured. The people were highly incensed, and the college president was forced to flee the State. Muldrow was tried at St. Charles and was acquitted, Edward Bates acting as his counsel.<sup>85</sup> It is interesting to note that his proposition was in harmony with the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution of 1820 which provides that slaves were not to be emancipated without the consent of their masters, or without paying them. The incident indicates that this clause had become unpopular, at least in Marion County. Two other men, Williams and Garrett, were ordered from Marion County the same year for receiving literature from the American Colonization Society. The feeling became so warm that upon Dr. Nelsons return to attend his sick son a public meeting was called at Palmyra, May 21, 1836, and it was resolved That we approve the recent conduct of a portion of our citizens towards
