Excerpt: ... more comprehensive reasons. Such being ever the want Chap. of principle in these courtier-statesmen, that he, the XXXI. friend of Temple, the upholder of the Dutch, and even of Spain against France, was induced to waive his objections and become the instrument of concluding a secret treaty with Louis by which Charles promised to become a Catholic, and to join in war against Holland, in order to obtain a portion of its spoil.* For this double treachery Charles was to be doubly paid, two millions of livres for the confession of Catholicism, and three millions annually for the troops and the vessels he was to furnish. The conclusion of this treaty was counteracted for a certain time by the efforts of the Dutch and of Temple to induce the emperor to join the Triple Alliance. Spain used all its influence at Vienna in the same sense. But the emperor was betrayed by two successive ministers, Auerberg and Lobkowitz, both of whom, and no doubt in part from mercenary motives, strongly favoured the French alliance. The emperor Leopold suspected them, but his easy nature still hesitated between the advantage of a treaty with Louis the Fourteenth for partitioning the dominions of the crown of Spain, and the danger of allowing a rival house to snatch and secure such enormous aggrandisement. Whilst he wavered between the two policies, and at least delayed accepting the proffers of De Witt and Temple, the secret alliance between France and England was concluded through the influence of the Duchess of Orleans, Charles's sister. She accompanied Louis in evidently ambitious and inquisitive tours through the towns, even the Spanish towns, Chap. of Flanders, and left him to meet and cajole Charles at XXX1- Dover. This procured the signature of the secret treaty in June 1670. * Boli...
