

The Presidents Policy (Classic Reprint)

From the Spectator, 26th December. Power is teaching Mr. Lincoln those reticent forms under which, in English opinion, a statesmans work should be done. His Message this year is marred by none of that dififuseness, made original by none of those quaintnesses which all his previous utterances have educated us to expect. That slight hesitation, too, which was formerly so perceptible, a hesitation as of a man doing his thinking aloud, and anxious to fortify his own judgment while convincing the country, has entirely disappeared. The Message is pervaded throughout by a new and impressive tone, as of a man who at last sees his way, whose mind is made up, and who will never again debate the policy he has adopted. The old foi-ensic tinge is, of course, there still, for it is as natural to the constitution-loving President as to the Illinois lawyer; but the tinge now is that which pervades the judge s, not the advocates mind. He does not argue with the nation, or with a party within the nation, or with the foes who are still barring the nations way; but he delivers a charge, a final summing-up of the law, which, while he occupies his position, will be executed, be the i-esistance what it may. Taking up a half-forgotten clause in the Constitution of the United States, a clause which binds the central authority to guarantee to every State a republican form of government, and protect it against domestic violence, and remembering his own prerogative of p.ardon, he builds thereon a polity as wide as the mischief to be put down. That clause, it is certain, was intended to apply to all cases in which a minority of well-affected persons were threatened by a majority hostile to republican institutions, and in that sense he employs it to work a revolution in the South. Recognising that slavery is the very root of the existing civil war, and that any desertion of the blacks w(Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and dont occur in the book.)
